Copy Writing

Part 5

Layout, Style & Readability

It's crucial that not only should your piece be easy to read it should also look easy to read. Here are a few simple rules:

Font Styles

Don't use too many fonts on a page as it makes things look untidy and unprofessional. For visual clarity two or maybe three are all you need. You can create emphasis and variation by using a mix of font sizes and occasional bold text.

Serif & Sans Serif

Serif fonts are those with extra decoration in the form of tails, ticks and feet added to the end of the lines that make up a letter. One of the most famous is Times New Roman. I often use Georgia. Sans Serif are fonts without this decoration such as Verdana and Helvetica.

Serifed typefaces are considered to be more legible and authoritative than sans serif and many people will tell you that you should always use a serif type for the body of your writing and sans serif to emphasis the headlines. This may have been the case but things evolve and I no longer agree with this rather outdated idea. We have become very used to seeing sans serif used for body text and studies have shown that we have adapted to it. If you want to be traditional then follow the rule otherwise use what you feel looks best.

Italics

Early italics were introduced to cut down on the amount of space taken up by the type and later were used in place of underlining for emphasis.

Italics look good with certain fonts but don't overdo it. Current thinking is that the use of italics can reduce readability by up to 50% and that's something to avoid.

Chunk it

If you have a lot of text, don't put it all into one big block. This gives the appearance of something that is going to be not only time consuming to read but also hard to read. It looks daunting to the reader and quite often people will look at it and think, I haven't got time for that now. Psychology labels this the perceived cognitive cost.

You get over this by breaking up your text into short well-spaced paragraphs. Small chunks of text are more inviting and your audience is much more likely to read what you have written. They look at the first small chunk and think, "I'll just read this bit – it will be quick."

Having read that first chunk, your AIDA style of writing should have them interested and they think, "I'll just read this next small paragraph". And so on ...

Upper & Lower Case

Don't use all upper case letters, it makes things hard to read and if you are writing for the Internet, web etiquette decrees it to be shouting.

Take a look at this example:

First all caps:

ALL WHO HAVE SEEN
JIGGERYPIPERY, OVER THE LAST FIVE YEARS, HAVE BEEN KNOCKED OUT
BY THEIR TRULY EXCITING BLEND OF SELF-COMPOSED AND TRADITIONAL
TUNES. THEIR ALBUM RELEASES
HAVE BEEN EXTREMELY WELL RECEIVED BY THE MEDIA AND HAVE BEEN PLAYED ON BOTH NATIONAL AND REGIONAL RADIO.

Then in mixed case:

All who have seen Jiggerypipery, over the last five years, have been knocked out by their truly exciting blend of self-composed and traditional tunes. Their album releases have been extremely well received by the media and have been played on both national and regional radio.

We can see that the top example takes up a lot more space and extends to an extra two lines. It has a higher perceived cognitive cost. More to the point, it just doesn't look right.

There's an even more compelling reason to avoid using all caps. 'TAKE A PHRASE' LIKE THIS. If you trace a line around that sentence, following the tops of the letters dropping down at the final 'S' and then following the base of the letters you would draw a rectangle. No matter what words are there you get a rectangle.

Now use the same phrase in mixed case: 'Take a phrase like this'. If you follow the outline this time you will see that the ascenders and descenders of the text cause an irregular shape to be drawn. Each word and phrase makes a shape. It is this shape that helps the brain to recognise what is written and this makes for better and easier readability.

Line length

For the same reason don't allow your lines of text to be too long. If you are writing something to be read on a computer screen make sure the lines do not stretch from one side of the monitor to the other.

If you think about it, newspapers control line length by using columns. It makes things much easier to read. Imagine if the lines of text extended across the full width of a broadsheet page. It would become very hard to read without losing your place every time your eyes scanned from the end of one line to the start of the next.

I'm not suggesting you should use columns on your web site because this would mean scrolling up and down to get from the end of one column to the start of the next. But you should try to keep your line length in check.

Get the reader to read to the end

If your writing runs to a number of pages you can break a sentence across two pages so the reader has to turn the page to finish reading it.

To tantalise the reader, end chapters or sections with a taster of what's to come in the next section. I can do that here by mentioning colour also has an important role to play as you'll see in next month's newsletter.
